Review Questions

"How large is the number?" is an example of a Fermi question, which requires estimating physical quantities in problems in science. Enrico Fermi was an Italian physicist known for his ability to make useful estimates and serve as a mathematical consultant and teacher. The expression is sometimes used to mean a number or value that is not exact but is close to the truth. Fermi's method is a problem-solving technique that involves using the approach and method of estimation with the information given. Fermi worked at the University of Chicago, and his classic question was: "How many piano tuners are there in the city of Chicago?"

Fermi questions help us making logical assumptions about a situation to make an estimate of the value and magnitude (usually in terms of 100). That is, the estimate is compared to known, reasonable, and known, and to the difference with is appropriate for the question.

Another example of a Fermi question is:

How many piano tuners are there in the city of Chicago?
