1.1. Introduction to eye tracking

Eye tracking is a technique for measuring eye movements and visual attention. It is used to study how people interact with digital content, such as websites, apps, and documents.

1.2. Eye tracking methods

Eye tracking methods can be divided into two main categories: direct and indirect.

Direct methods involve recording eye movements directly, such as using eye-tracking glasses or a head-mounted display.

Indirect methods involve inferring eye movements from other data, such as mouse movements or scroll history.

Direct methods are more accurate but also more expensive and less comfortable for users.

Indirect methods are less accurate but also less expensive and more comfortable for users. They are often used for large-scale studies or for studies where direct methods are not feasible.

Eye tracking data can be used to study a wide range of topics, including user interface design, website usability, and marketing research.

Direct methods are more accurate but also more expensive and less comfortable for users.
