

Alice in Wonderland

This extract comes from the beginning of Chapter 2.
In an attempt to reach a small golden key, Alice has consumed a piece of cake and is now growing upwards at an alarming rate.

"Curiouser and curiouser!" cried Alice, quite surprised that she had somehow forgotten how to speak properly. "Now, I'm opening up like an enormous telescope!" Alice looked down and noticed that her feet were so far away that they were nearly out of sight. "Oh, my poor little feet! I wonder who will put shoes and socks on you now. I know I won't be able to for I am too far away; you must manage yourselves." At this point, a thought reached Alice and she reasoned that if she were to abandon her feet altogether then they may well do the same to her. Worried about the possibility of her feet taking her in the wrong direction, Alice vowed that she would send them a present every Christmas in an attempt to win their favour. As she continued planning, she thought to herself how odd the address would look:

Just then, her head struck against the roof: in fact, she was now more than nine feet high. At once, she grabbed the little key and hurried over to the locked door. Poor Alice! Although tall enough to get the key, she was now far too large to make it through the unlocked door. As she lay on her side, one eye peering through the seemingly miniscule door, she began to cry.

"You ought to be ashamed of yourself," she admonished. "A great girl like you to go on crying in this way. Stop this moment, I tell you!" Unsurprisingly, scolding herself had done nothing to stem the flow of tears and there was soon a large pool surrounding her; it was around four inches deep and reached halfway down the hall.
