Planned Happenstance: Constructing Unexpected Career Opportunities

Chance plays an important role in everyone's career, but career counseling is still perceived as a process designed to eliminate chance from career decision making. Traditional career counseling interventions are no longer sufficient to prepare clients to respond to career uncertainties. Work world shifts challenge career counselors to adopt a counseling intervention that views unplanned events as both inevitable and desirable. Counselors need to teach clients to engage in exploratory activities to increase the probability that the clients will discover unexpected career opportunities. Unplanned events can become opportunities for learning.

Traditionally, career counselors act as if chance plays no role in their clients' career planning. We intend to explore how chance events inevitably play a major role in everyone's career and how events attributed to chance are often indirect outcomes of effective behavior. Career counselors can teach their clients to act in ways that generate a higher frequency of beneficial chance events on which clients can capitalize.

The popular Tom Cruise movie Jerry McGuire (Crowe, 1997) is based on the life of a high-powered professional sports agent, Leigh Steinberg. In a recent interview, Steinberg explained that he got his start through "pure, random chance" (Snider, 1997). But did he? Tracing a sequence of events in Steinberg's life provides key points to be considered.

During the early 1970s, Steinberg was a student at the University of California at Berkeley working his way through law school as a dormitory counselor and serving as student body president. Steinberg planned to pursue either a job opportunity with the County District Attorney's Office or opportunities in the field of environmental law. As luck would have it, the freshman football team moved into his dormitory. He befriended several of the student athletes including one named Steve Bartkowski, who went on to become an outstanding professional football player. (Note that Steinberg had managed to get admitted to law school, that someone had detected qualities in him sufficient to appoint him as a dormitory counselor, that Steinberg had persuaded a majority of university students to elect him as their student body president, and that he had become good friends with a star athlete. Were all these events the result of pure random chance?)

During his final year at the university, Bartkowski was selected as the first draft pick of the Atlanta Falcons. Bartkowski asked Steinberg to represent him in contract negotiations with the Falcons, and "the rest is history" because Steinberg has gone on to represent many professional athletes and other celebrities during the last 20 years. (Was Steinberg the only person capable of representing Bartkowski? Obviously Bartkowski must have observed qualities in Steinberg that gave him confidence that he would be well represented. Did his subsequent clients choose him through pure random chance? It is very likely that other clients must have observed the results of his performance while representing Bartkowski.)

It certainly did not hurt Steinberg's cause that he began his career by representing a National Football League first round draft choice. His decision to accept Bartkowski's invitation was a risky move. He had no actual experience in the highly competitive, pressurized, and sometimes cut-throat arena of professional sports. Steinberg could have said "no," but instead he took the risk and said "yes."
