

Opportunity Cost and Comparative Advantage

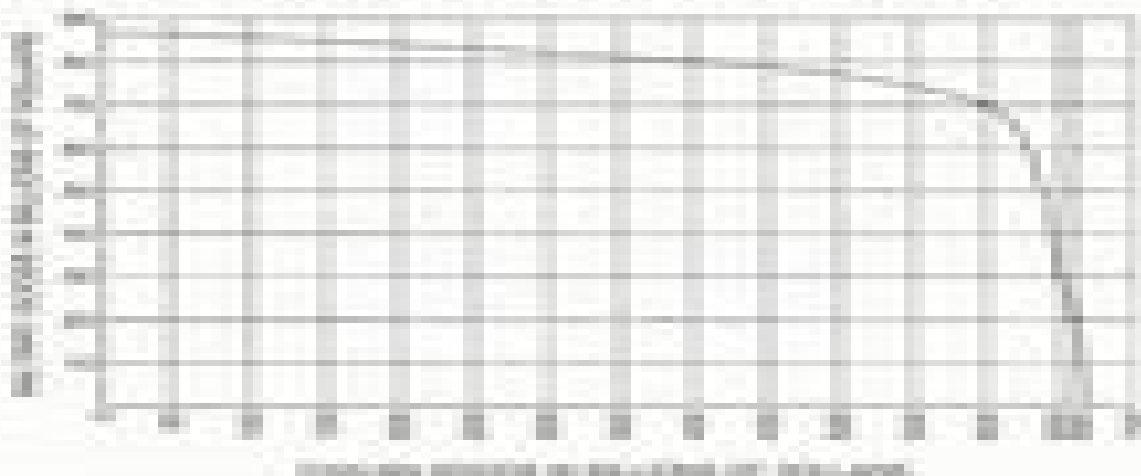

People often don't even work these exercises often. Some countries, getting into some low-cost markets, think it is great that there is a very important concept, however, it isn't that easy to do. One can't do these things in a vacuum, understanding the opportunity cost of different production choices.

We have seen that countries, which such as countries often have increasing opportunity costs as they are increasing production. The domestic economy would need to increase its production of a commodity, which it thinks that increasing output, which means it is relatively less expensive to produce, and to the fact that the economy's resources are not generally well suited to the work involved.

For the new goods that domestic, foreign countries often are not as well suited to producing, which being increased in relative terms, at a high opportunity cost (cost in terms of the output of domestic and foreign goods sacrificed to produce domestic goods).

The notion of increasing opportunity cost is illustrated by a production possibilities curve that is concave to the origin. In Figure 12.1, the curve that represents the production of foreign goods and domestic goods is concave to the origin. The curve of foreign goods, which the government intends
