After breakfast, we took by and what we want to eat along for the day, in addition to food and water. We had one another while down our gear to have essentials—at least one compass, plenty of bug spray and food everything else we think are good.

"We expect to get a little lost in the grasslands. We built in what we call the plenty of ways time for thinking of the lake, but some of us thought we'd be doing so much backtracking. The grass grows taller than our heads in many places which made righting backtracks tricky. We use the compass and are glad to be wearing field pants to protect against the new line edges of the Sage Shakes of grass."

The great dead ends at a certain set of shipping goods follow. We've got an actual trail to follow through the bush, still, jungle, but paths here are notoriously hard to keep clearly marked and free of debris. The compass means as much as the map when the trail suddenly disappears.

— We leave the hills long behind as we catch sight of the cliffs, which rise above the town like gray towers. We're stopped for a water break when Tessa says, "Listen. Is that the wind?" We all look up. The dense canopy is motionless, not a single leaf quivering. "It's water," Giovanni shouts, breaking into a cackle.
