Background: The purpose of this study was to determine the prevalence of self-reported hearing impairment in a community sample of older adults and to examine the association between self-reported hearing impairment and demographic and clinical variables. Methods: Data were obtained from the National Health and Medical Research Council's Australian Hearing Study, a population-based study of hearing impairment in older adults. Results: The prevalence of self-reported hearing impairment was 10.3% in the community sample. The prevalence of self-reported hearing impairment was significantly higher in females than in males, in those with lower education, and in those with lower income. The prevalence of self-reported hearing impairment was significantly higher in those with a history of cardiovascular disease, diabetes, and depression. Conclusion: The prevalence of self-reported hearing impairment in a community sample of older adults is 10.3%. The prevalence of self-reported hearing impairment is significantly higher in females than in males, in those with lower education, and in those with lower income. The prevalence of self-reported hearing impairment is significantly higher in those with a history of cardiovascular disease, diabetes, and depression.
