

options, from active surveillance, surgery (with a very detailed and illustrated description) and radiotherapy, to novel local therapies. The existing limitations in understanding how best to avoid over- or under-treatment of patients with prostate cancer are clearly described. There is a section on patient counselling and the latter part of the book covers the detection and management of relapse and metastatic disease and end-of-life care. The final two chapters discuss the future challenges of managing prostate cancer as a chronic disease and potential developments in the approach to diagnostic and disease management strategies, including genetic studies.

The overall presentation of this textbook is excellent. Topics are covered in a logical manner and the content is presented in 17 relatively short chapters, with appropriate subheadings, that make for easy access to areas of interest. The text is well written and clear and the level of detail is commendable in such a compact volume. The illustrations complement the text and the range of tables, radiological images, diagrams and photographs (including a set of colour plates) are of great quality. Each chapter is well referenced and the index is good. There are 48 contributions to the book, from seven countries. Either European or USA perspectives are therefore predominantly discussed in some chapters, depending upon each contributor's affiliation, but the general international balance is maintained. There is inevitably an overlap in the content of some chapters, with different contributors covering the same topic, such as PCA, but this is largely complementary information, with alternative viewpoints or aspects discussed. The Gleason grading system is, however, much better discussed in the histopathology chapter, as would be expected, than it is when described elsewhere.

This textbook fulfils its objective of giving a detailed – but succinct and easily accessible – account of prostate cancer for interested clinicians of different specialties and grades, with guidance on appropriate and best practice patient management. Pathologists wishing to expand their knowledge of current diagnostic techniques, and the various treatment modalities available for prostate cancer, will find it an enjoyable and informative read.

Pathology of the Female Reproductive Tract, 3rd edition

George S. Muttus, Jaime Prat
Churchill Livingstone, 2014.
£181.77, 904 pages (Kindle edition
£155.54)
ISBN 978 0 70204 497 7

Pathology of the Female Reproductive Tract has been a truly international project since its inception. The current edition is authored by 13 experts in gynaecological pathology, including two authors from the UK, C Simon Hemington and W' Glenn McChagge. The book originally began with Malcom Anderson's volume of the Female Reproductive System in the Gynaecology Series in 1999, becoming a standalone textbook in 2005.

The 2005 second edition was named Robbey's Pathology of the Female Reproductive Tract in recognition of the enormous editorial effort of Stanley Robbey. He was the main editor and contributed to 17 of the 38 chapters. Robbey was inaugurated President of the College of American Pathologists in 2011 and has contributed to six chapters in the current edition.

Readers will find this book an excellent reference for gynaecological pathology. It has an easily available text accompanied by high-quality images, tables and algorithms, and even the most recent FIGO staging and WHO classifications throughout.

New to this edition are the presence of a helpful outline in the beginning of each chapter, a chapter dedicated to the molecular biology of cervical neoplasia (chapter 3) and practical information on intra-operative consultation and sampling (some issues included in some chapters).

HPV-related diseases of the lower genital tract are comprehensively discussed in six chapters. The two-tier system of low-grade dysplasia (LSIL) and high-grade dysplasia (HSIL) for all HPV-related pre-invasive squamous lesions of the lower genital tract has been used and a similar scheme is also used for endometrial hyperplasia (non-atypical versus atypical) and endometrial carcinoma (type 1 versus type 2). Some UK pathologists may be disappointed to see the term 'AIS' used instead of high-grade CCIN and low-grade CCIN with its images have been deleted in this edition.

The topical subject of differentiated VIN is thoroughly discussed, including its pathology/pathology, microscopy, differential diagnosis, biomarkers and clinical behaviour.

It is often difficult to predict the behaviour and plan for treatment of endometrial serous EIC, especially when it is found locally as an endometrial polyp. A statement that reads 'serous EIC cannot be considered a precursor lesion, but rather an intraepithelial stage of carcinoma capable of spreading to distant sites' can be helpful for pathologists, gynaecologists and patients.

The malignant potential of endometriosis and the role of ARID1A mutations in endometrioid and clear cell carcinogenesis is clarified with this statement: 'Nearly half of clear cell carcinoma carry the ARID1A mutation, this suggest that ARID1A inactivation occurs early during malignant transformation of endometriosis'.

High-grade endometrial stromal sarcoma, which was prematurely removed in the second edition, is now resurrected based upon its distinctive histological and molecular characteristics. The role of ESR1 in the development of ovarian serous carcinoma is discussed in chapter 11, including the helpful practical advice about the use of the SER-ITM protocol for extensive sampling of the fallopian tubes in women with BRCA gene mutation.

Relevant and updated cytogenetic alterations are discussed such as XNP's MYC gene fusion in low-grade endometrial stromal sarcoma and TSHAF-PRM1 gene fusion in a subset of high-grade endometrial stromal sarcoma. Chapter 38, which is dedicated to immunohistochemistry biomarkers, contains helpful advice regarding the diagnostic and prognostic usefulness and limitations of these markers in gynaecological pathology.
