The diagram shows the structure of a neuron, which is the basic unit of the nervous system. It consists of a cell body (soma) containing the nucleus, and a long, thin projection called an axon. The axon is covered by a myelin sheath, which is made of specialized cells called glial cells. The axon terminates in a synapse, which is a junction between the axon and another cell.

The diagram also shows the structure of a muscle fiber, which is a long, cylindrical cell. It contains many mitochondria and a large nucleus. The muscle fiber is covered by a sarcolemma, which is a specialized cell membrane. The sarcolemma contains many small gaps called gap junctions, which allow for the transmission of electrical signals between adjacent muscle fibers.

The diagram also shows the structure of a blood vessel, which is a tube that carries blood. It has a thick wall made of muscle and connective tissue. The blood vessel is covered by a layer of cells called the endothelium, which is a specialized cell membrane. The endothelium contains many small gaps called tight junctions, which prevent the leakage of substances out of the blood vessel.

The diagram also shows the structure of a gland, which is an organ that secretes substances. It has a duct that carries the secretions to the site of action. The gland is covered by a layer of cells called the epithelium, which is a specialized cell membrane. The epithelium contains many small gaps called tight junctions, which prevent the leakage of substances out of the gland.

The diagram also shows the structure of a skin cell, which is a large, flat cell. It contains many mitochondria and a large nucleus. The skin cell is covered by a layer of cells called the epidermis, which is a specialized cell membrane. The epidermis contains many small gaps called tight junctions, which prevent the leakage of substances out of the skin.
