SECTION 4B

These findings suggest that the use of an individual's own history of smoking cessation is a more effective way to encourage smoking cessation than using a general message about the benefits of quitting. This finding is consistent with the idea that people are more likely to change their behavior when they see a role model who has successfully changed their behavior. This finding also suggests that the use of a personal history of smoking cessation may be a more effective way to encourage smoking cessation than using a general message about the benefits of quitting.

When it comes to the use of force, the U.S. has a long history of using force to achieve its goals. The U.S. has used force to achieve its goals in the past, and it is likely to continue to do so in the future. The U.S. has used force to achieve its goals in the past, and it is likely to continue to do so in the future.

These authors also found that the perceived health status of the respondents was significantly related to the prevalence of the disease. The prevalence of the disease was significantly higher in respondents who perceived their health status as poor than in those who perceived their health status as good.

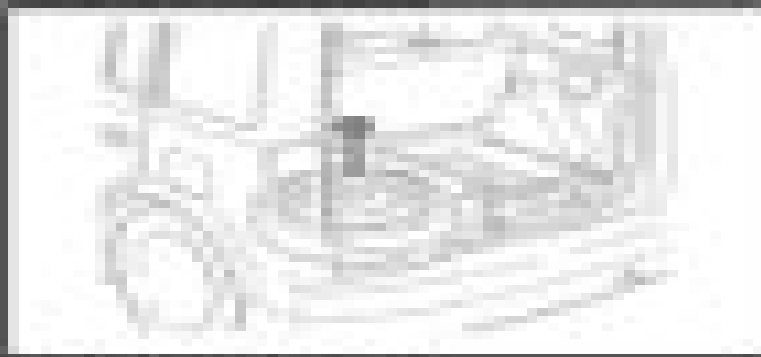

- to help control the disease and the related stress that comes with it. "There's a lot of support out there," says Dr. Kohn. "But it's important to know when to ask for help."

These samples (submitted for the second year) contained significant but inconsistent differences in $\delta^{15}\text{N}$ and $\delta^{13}\text{C}$ (Table 1). The $\delta^{15}\text{N}$ values were also highly variable, but could not be explained by any obvious patterns.
