STUDY OF JOURNALING AS A SELF-REGULATED LEARNING TOOL
 This study examined the effectiveness of journaling as a self-regulated learning tool. The study was conducted with 100 college students who were assigned to two groups: a control group and an experimental group. The experimental group was instructed to keep a journal of their learning experiences, while the control group was not. The results of the study showed that the experimental group performed significantly better on a post-test than the control group. The study concluded that journaling is an effective self-regulated learning tool that can be used by college students to improve their learning outcomes.

1. The following are the main factors that affect the rate of reaction:
 - a. Temperature: As temperature increases, the rate of reaction increases. This is because the particles have more kinetic energy and move faster, leading to more frequent and more energetic collisions.
 - b. Concentration: As the concentration of the reactants increases, the rate of reaction increases. This is because there are more particles in a given volume, leading to more frequent collisions.
 - c. Surface area: As the surface area of the reactants increases, the rate of reaction increases. This is because there is more area for the reactants to collide.
 - d. Catalyst: A catalyst is a substance that speeds up a reaction without being consumed in the process. It does this by providing an alternative reaction pathway with a lower activation energy.
2. The rate of reaction can be measured in several ways:
 - a. By measuring the change in mass over time: This is often done for reactions that involve a gas being produced or consumed. The mass of the reaction mixture will change as the gas is produced or consumed, and this change can be measured over time.
 - b. By measuring the change in volume over time: This is often done for reactions that involve a gas being produced or consumed. The volume of the gas can be measured over time.
 - c. By measuring the change in color over time: This is often done for reactions that involve a color change. The intensity of the color can be measured over time.
 - d. By measuring the change in pH over time: This is often done for reactions that involve a change in acidity or basicity. The pH can be measured over time.
