

In practice, we often do tests as hypothesis tests, not as regression tests, as we do in regression. probably neither hypothesis test. In some cases, testing for a difference in regression coefficients is not equivalent to testing for a difference in means, which is what we want to test. not a regression test, but a hypothesis test.

The null hypothesis is that the two regression lines are the same. The alternative hypothesis is that the two regression lines are different. The test statistic is the F-statistic, which is the ratio of the mean square between groups to the mean square within groups. The F-statistic is compared to a critical value from the F-distribution to determine whether to reject the null hypothesis. not a regression test, but a hypothesis test.

Example 1: Suppose we have two groups of students, each with a different number of hours of study. We want to test whether the number of hours of study is related to the number of hours of study. The null hypothesis is that the number of hours of study is not related to the number of hours of study. The alternative hypothesis is that the number of hours of study is related to the number of hours of study.
