

UNIT 2: NARRATIVE		WRITING LESSON 2.11 Transition Words
WRITING	GRAMMAR		SELF-REGULATION
I will be able to use transition words in a narrative.	I will be able to identify pronouns.		I will set goals for my writing.
	SAY: We are writing personal narratives about the house-building challenge. We have done the P (plan), Q (organize), and R (write) steps in the writing process with this prompt. TEACH: Remind students what they have completed so far in their personal narratives to respond to this prompt. They have already written the beginning and the middle in the previous lessons. Remind students that a narrative needs a beginning, middle, and ending. STUDENTS: Turn and talk to tell a partner what parts of their personal narrative they have completed. Go over today's objectives with students.
	SAY: We learned about some different nouns – common and proper. We are learning this week about pronouns. A pronoun takes the place of a noun. Some examples of pronouns are he, his, she, and her. Just like there are different kinds of nouns, there are different kinds of pronouns. TEACH: Explain the pronoun types on the slide. But, not pronouns word also taught in Unit 2, week 2. A subject pronoun is a pronoun that is the subject of the sentence. An indirect pronoun is a pronoun that receives a person, place, or thing that is not specific. Sometimes, sometimes, anyone, somewhere, anywhere, etc. A possessive pronoun shows ownership (mine, yours, his, hers, etc.) Teacher note: The goal is not for students to be able to categorize pronouns by type, but to understand that those words are also pronouns and take the place of a noun in a sentence. SAY: Let's read the paragraphs first our home about what a journalist does. TEACH: Teacher reads the paragraph about. The first time is just to understand the content of the paragraph. Read the paragraph a second time. STUDENTS: Students follow along and circle pronouns in the paragraph.
	SAY: In narrative writing, it is important to use transition words. These can also be called linking words. Transition words help the story flow and show the sequence of events or ideas. This helps the reader understand what things in the story are happening. STUDENTS: Turn and talk to share some transition words they have used or read before. SAY: We will watch a video to hear a narrative story about a raccoon. Journalist word file. By the way, you can identify the parts of a narrative while we listen. TEACH: Play the video for students. STUDENTS: Listen to the story and look for parts of a narrative. SAY: As we learned in the video, have the students moved around the words in the story and we'll read a short narrative about the raccoon. TEACH: Read the narrative to students, saying the words. Explain that it sounded a little funny (and was hard) to follow because it was missing the linking words! Then, read the transition words in the word bank with students. Write the missing transition words in the blanks and read the narrative again to show how much easier it is to follow a story when there are transition words. STUDENTS: Fill in the missing transition words in their papers. Go over goal setting using the self-regulation slide.
	SAY: You will need the page from our last lesson where you wrote the middle / events in your personal narrative. TEACH: Explain the think, say, write routine today using the steps on the slide. STUDENTS: Students will look for transition words they already have in their narrative and lightly underline them. They will also add other transition words to their personal narrative.
	Give students specific transition words to use in their writing. If students have a hard time fitting in the transition words on their writing, show them how to write between lines.		Provide students with additional paper if they have more to write than fits on their page. Students can never other narrative writing to add transition words, such as their comic book or personal narratives.
