

UNIT 2: NARRATIVE		WRITING LESSON 2.11 Transition Words
WRITING	GRAMMAR	SELF-REGULATION
I will be able to use transition words in a narrative.	I will be able to identify pronouns.	I will set goals for my writing.
	SAY: We are writing personal narratives about the house-building challenge. We have done the P (plan), O (organize), and W (write) steps in the writing process with the prompt. TEACH: Remind students what they have completed so far in their personal narratives to respond to the prompt. They have already written the beginning and the middle in the previous lessons. Remind students that a narrative needs a beginning, middle, and ending. STUDENTS: Turn and talk to tell a partner what parts of their personal narrative they have completed. Go over today's objectives with students.
	SAY: We learned about some different kinds of pronouns and proper nouns. We are learning the words about pronouns. A pronoun takes the place of a noun. Some examples of pronouns are he, his, she, and her. Just like there are different kinds of nouns, there are different kinds of pronouns. TEACH: Explain the pronoun types on the slide. Subjunct pronouns were also taught in Unit 2 lesson 2. A subjunct pronoun is a pronoun that is the subject of the sentence. An indirect pronoun is a pronoun that means a person, place, or thing that is not speaking. Examples: everybody, everyone, anyone, someone, anywhere, etc. A possessive pronoun shows ownership. Mine, yours, his, hers, etc. Teacher note: The goal is not for students to be able to categorize pronouns by type, but to understand that those words are the pronouns and take the place of a noun in a sentence. SAY: Let's read the paragraph to find out more about what a journalist does. TEACH: Teacher reads the paragraph about this first time is just to understand the content of the paragraph. Read the paragraph a second time. STUDENTS: Students follow along and circle pronouns in the paragraph.
	SAY: In narrative writing, it is important to use transition words. These can also be called connecting words. Transition words help to join two ideas and show the sequence or order of events. This helps the reader understand what is going on in the story and what is happening. STUDENTS: Turn and talk to share some transition words they have used or read before. SAY: We will watch a video to hear a narrative story about a healthy journaling habit. See if you can identify the parts of a narrative when we learn. TEACH: Play the video for students. STUDENTS: Watch the video and look for parts of a narrative. SAY: As we learned in the video, have the students moved around the room to share what we read is their narrative about the journal. TEACH: Read the narrative to students, reading the slides. Explain that I sounded it out funny and with a lot of pauses because I was making transition words. Then, read the narrative without the words to let students hear the missing transition words in the story and read the narrative again to show how much easier it is to follow a story when there are transition words. STUDENTS: Find the missing transition words at their tables. Go over and write using the self-regulation slide.
	SAY: You will need the page from our last lesson where you wrote the middle / events in your personal narrative. TEACH: Explain the think, say, write routine today using the steps on the slide. STUDENTS: Students will look for transition words they already have in their narrative and lightly underline them. They will also add other transition words to their personal narrative.
	 Give students specific transition words to use in their writing. If students have a hard time fitting in the transition words on their writing, show them how to write between lines.
		 Provide students with additional paper if they have more to write than fits on their page. Students can revisit other narrative writing to add transition words, such as their comic book or personal narratives.
