Reconfigurable Flight Control Designs with Application to the X-33 Vehicle John J. Burken, 1999 Two methods for control system reconfiguration have been investigated The first method is a robust servomechanism control approach optimal tracking problem that is a generalization of the classical proportional plus integral control to multiple input multiple output systems The second method is a control allocation approach based on a quadratic programming formulation A globally convergent fixed point iteration algorithm has been developed to make onboard implementation of this method feasible These methods have been applied to reconfigurable entry flight control design for the X 33 vehicle Examples presented demonstrate simultaneous tracking of angle of attack and roll angle commands during failures of the right body flap actuator Although simulations demonstrate success of the first method in most cases the control allocation method appears to provide uniformly better performance in all cases Inverse
