

Chris McCandless: Unraveling Personality Through MBTI

4 pages | 784 words

Chris McCandless, the central figure in Jon Krakauer's narrative, is a compelling character whose temperament aligns with introversion (I), sensing (S), and perceiving (P) in the Myers-Briggs Type Indicator (MBTI). This essay provides an in-depth exploration of McCandless's personality traits, delving into his preferences for extroversion/introversion, sensing/intuition, and thinking/feeling.

Introversion: A Journey into Solitude

In the dichotomy of extroversion and introversion, McCandless distinctly leans towards introversion. The MBTI Basics asserts that introverts find solace in solitary activities or small group settings, a trait vividly portrayed in McCandless's persona. His preference for solo travel is exemplified by his abandonment of his car to traverse on foot, relishing the freedom of isolation (Krakauer 28). An extrovert, seeking external stimuli for energy, would unlikely embark on such solitary journeys. McCandless's introversion signifies a need to disconnect from society, perhaps for rejuvenation or self-discovery.

Further analysis of McCandless's interactions with others reveals his introverted nature. His relationship with his car becomes symbolic of his preference for solitude. McCandless deliberately chose to undertake trips alone, showcasing a proclivity for doing things independently. This solitude extended beyond choice when he left his car, embracing the open road and foot travel, reinforcing the idea that his introversion was not merely a preference but a fundamental aspect of his character (Krakauer 28).

Sensing: Navigating Reality with Pragmatism

Turning to the sensing and intuition preferences, McCandless aligns with sensing. According to the MBTI Basics, sensing individuals prioritize tangible facts and recall essential details. McCandless's decision-making process is a testament to this preference. At the Morelos Dam and the Mexican border, McCandless, lacking identification, employs a pragmatic approach by navigating through the dam's open floodgates and the spillway below (Krakauer 34).

This incident highlights McCandless's inclination toward sensing. Rather than meticulously planning ahead, he learns through action, adapting on the go. Sensing individuals, as opposed to their intuitive counterparts, eschew detailed plans, preferring to embrace uncertainty. McCandless embodies this sensor's approach, navigating through challenges with a focus on the present moment rather than relying on preconceived plans.

Thinking: Rationality in Decision-Making

Examining the thinking and feeling preferences, McCandless exhibits a proclivity for thinking. Thinkers, as per the MBTI Basics, may overlook the emotional aspects of a situation. This inclination is evident in McCandless's interactions with people, exemplified by his communication with Burres. Despite sending her a postcard disclosing his location and expressing relief at her well-being, McCandless's decision to abruptly depart without meeting her in person reflects a rational, detached approach (Krakauer 43).

A feeling individual might have opted for a more emotionally connected departure, waiting for a face-to-face interaction before embarking on a new journey. McCandless's characterization as a "thinker" is accentuated by his disdain for the mundane, as seen in his departure from Bullhead, a town he perceived as filled with "plastic people."

Further evidence of McCandless's thinking preference is seen in how he handles situations with people. His description of the people around him as "plastic" suggests a lack of emotional connection, indicating a rational assessment of his social environment. The decision to leave a note instead of waiting for a visit demonstrates his prioritization of autonomy...
