Terence Bowman

Armagh City Southern Education And Library Board:

People's Champion Terence Bowman,1997 When Alexander Bowman was elected in Belfast Corporation as Labour member in Duncairn in 1897 the very idea that he would still be remembered a century later for his relentless championing of the working class cause appeared unthinkable Yet Bowman a near penniless flaxdresser from a humble farming background richly deserves his place in Irish political and labour history Twelve years earlier in 1885 following his key role in the birth of organised trade unionism in Belfast he had been the first working class Irishman to seek a seat at Westminster His subsequent support for Gladstone's Home Rule bill and the Dublin parliament which he believed offered the best hope of bringing together Irish people of all persuasions attracted much criticism Forced to leave Belfast in 1888 he found himself immersed in the embryonic socialist movements first in Glasgow and then in London Returning with new ideas to the Belfast trade union fold in 1895 he won the Corporation seat two years later and in 1901 was elected President of the Irish Trade Union Congress This biography by his journalist great grandson Terence Bowman pays long overdue tribute to a labour pioneer who at great personal cost dedicated his life sufficiently to the welfare of the working classes to earn their and now our respect as a People's Champion

Pathways to Ulster's Past Peter Collins,1998 Researching Down Ancestors Ian Maxwell,2004 Of all the nine counties of Ulster none can claim a more cosmopolitan and fascinating history than Down In ancient times it formed part of the ancient kingdom of the Ulaí the Dal Fiatach the most important of the groupings of tribes of Ulaí came to dominate the east of the county with their capital at Downpatrick Vikings came to raid and then settled along the coast Later the Normans seized control of the Dal Fiatach kingdom constructing castles monasteries and abbeys before becoming hibernicised In the seventeenth century thousands of Scottish and English settlers poured into Down establishing themselves in the north and east of the county Meanwhile the native Irish were able to preserve their way of life in south Down where their close knit communities were sufficiently well organised under their traditional leaders to co exist with the newcomers The distribution of surnames in the county provides lasting evidence of its complex history The purpose of this book is to provide a practical guide for the family historian searching for ancestors in County Down It is true that many records have been lost including those in the destruction of the Public Record Office in Dublin in 1922 However much has survived to aid the dedicated family or local historian Moreover it has become increasingly accessible in the detailed catalogues and user friendly searching aids in the Public Record Office of Northern Ireland Because of the breadth of the material covered this book will appeal both to the experienced researcher and to the novice Of particular value are the detailed listings of the records of landed estates churches and schools as well as the appendices listing townlands and unofficial place names for the county
