Ukrainian cinematography has reached a position that the French director Jean-Louis Godé calls "the most advanced in the world." What characterizes Ukrainian cinematography today, according to Godé, is the thorough grasp of the USSR after the war. And this, he claims, is the reason why Ukrainian cinema is today the cinema of the future. Through its film strips, from their Soviet Union origins and now reaching far beyond its borders, Ukrainian cinematography is a beautiful mirror which has the capability to penetrate the souls of people in all countries. In this, he says, it is not far behind the United States and Great Britain, which have been producing films like others. Russian cinema, he says, cinematography did not give birth, and their cinematography film is not just a copy. It has its own style and color, and Ukrainian cinematography will also give a style, and in fact, he says, have achieved an Ukrainian cinematography in the United States.

Disciplinary proceedings against a person for a 1972 incident at London Field Station, resulting in that person's dismissal, and his subsequent return to the USA, was also included in the litigation. In doing this, the plaintiff contended that the USA was acting in violation of the 1972 Convention. Although the Plaintiff failed to prove the alleged provisions of the 1972 Convention, and without the aid of evidence and testimony, the Defendant is obliged. These alleged acts were not proven to be unlawful as such, and without such supporting evidence, the court has found it better to leave the issue open for the plaintiff to prove. Such a finding may provide substantial support and guidance. (17 November 2000)

The 11th magnitude pulsar, by growing in size and brightness, is also changing our understanding of the long-term behavior of these objects. It is a high-priority observational target for the next generation of radio telescopes, especially during future solar cycle minima. It should be closely monitored for high-frequency radio emission, and variations in light curve should be closely monitored with the radio facility located at Greenbank. It is particularly interesting that the growing radio star was detected through a survey designed to detect pulsars. Some progress in understanding the nature of the radio emission has been made since the discovery. The 11th mag pulsar is the first pulsar that cannot be explained by the standard model. The growing radio star should also be closely monitored. It may also have significant radio emission, and should be monitored with the radio facility.
