Good nutrition and exercise are a crucial component to healthy physical and brain development. Children who exercise and eat healthy are more likely to not have health issues, have a better self esteem, and excel academically. One way to change the way our children eat is to educate our children about healthy eating and the effects of proper nutrition, which should start where our children learn every day. The ultimate goal of most schools is to educate our children, but this becomes an issue if our children are not getting the proper nutrition.

Several studies have shown students that have experienced malnutrition have compromised intelligence and academic performance. Other studies have shown students with low amounts of protein in their diet had the lowest achievement scores. If a child is suffering from anemia they can fall victim to poor concentration skills, irritability, fatigue and lack of attention span. The lack of fruits and vegetables along with shoving a ton of processed foods down our children's throats for lunch, not only has a huge impact on children's brain function, but on also on their health.

Education is a eye component in preventing a number of health issues including obesity. Obesity is now the most widespread medical problem amongst children. Fifteen to thirty-three percent of children ages six to nineteen are obese. Since the sass's, the numbers have doubled. Eating habits of children have shifted from eating fresh fruits and vegetables to a diet of high fat, low nutrition, fast food, processed snacks and sugary drinks. Subtract daily exercise and you get a generation of children with diabetes, heart disease, high blood pressure, breathing problems and trouble sleeping.

In addition to hose health conditions you also have children with very low self-esteem who can eventually suffer from clinical depression. Children that are obese suffer from depression much more than children of normal weight. Overweight children often avoid sports and other physical activities as they often cannot keep up with their peers. Children that are overweight are more likely to be bullied and rejected from other children's activities. They develop poor body image and lack of confidence. Obese children are also more likely to have substance abuse problems due to these issues.

They involve themselves in sedentary activities which lead to the feeling of loneliness. This becomes a vicious cycle of overeating to help relieve stress and unhappiness. If schools want our children to do well academically, then they need to not only help prevent obesity but also teach and show the link between healthy eating and different diseases and health conditions. Being overweight increases the risk of several conditions and diseases such as asthma, diabetes, gallstones, and heart disease because of the amount of cholesterol and triglycerides in their blood
