Abstract

Other work suggests that people with a history of trauma may be more likely to engage in self-harm or suicidal behavior. This is particularly true for people with a history of childhood trauma, which is associated with a higher risk of self-harm and suicidal behavior. This is because childhood trauma can lead to a number of psychological and physiological changes that increase the risk of self-harm and suicidal behavior. For example, childhood trauma can lead to a higher level of emotional reactivity, which can make it more difficult to cope with stress and increase the risk of self-harm and suicidal behavior. Additionally, childhood trauma can lead to a higher level of impulsivity, which can also increase the risk of self-harm and suicidal behavior. Therefore, it is important to be aware of the potential risks associated with childhood trauma and to seek help if you are experiencing any of these symptoms.
