

Accounting Concepts

Should we buy stock in a company? Should we extend a line of credit to a company? Should we continue with current operations or change how we do business? These are the types of questions stakeholders ask themselves. Stakeholders require useful accounting information in order to make accurate financial decisions. In accordance with a generally accepted accounting principles (GAAP), a company's financial statement must contain accurate accounting information and is used in financial reporting.

How do you know whether accounting information is useful? Review each of the accounting concepts below that describe the qualitative characteristics of accounting information.

Business entity concept	Cost concept	Going concern concept	Matching concept
Objectivity concept	Unit of measure concept	Adequate disclosure concept	Accounting period concept

In each of the following scenarios, which accounting concept is being violated?

1. A major explosion at your company's main production facility caused a two-month stoppage of operations during a busy time of year. It went unreported because the accountant said its dollar effect was too low.
2. Because of recent technological breakthroughs in your company's main product, the selling price has increased and the accountants have increased the value of the company's inventory.
3. The accountants at your company have decided to state the financial statements in euros because the company does a lot of business in Italy.
4. Your company's monthly income statement shows the highest monthly revenue earned this year (in July) compared to the highest amount paid for each expense so far this year.
5. Your company recently filed for bankruptcy.
6. Building construction costs have skyrocketed in your area, making your company's building significantly more valuable, so the accounting records have been updated to reflect the estimated selling price for this asset.
7. Most of your company's sales occur in the fall, so a summary income statement was issued for Spring-Summer of the current year.
8. A completely separate company from the one with which you are concerned may not make it through the year. This information was included in your company's financial statements.
