

A platelet is an irregularly shaped disk found in the blood that contains granules in the center and clear protoplasm on the periphery but no definite nucleus; it is also known as thrombocyte. It also aids in the prevention of bleeding by clumping and forming plugs in blood vessel injuries.

k. Plasma

Plasma is the most abundant component of your blood. Plasma is a light yellow liquid that separates from the rest of the blood. Plasma transports water, salts, and enzymes as well as nutrients, hormones, and proteins to the parts of the body that require them.

l. Ventricle

m. Veins

Veins are blood vessel with thin muscular walls and large lumen which takes blood towards the heart.

l. What happens in each of the heart chambers?
