Question 2 (a):

Question 2 (a):

To analyze the profit maximization output decision by a producer under the monopoly market, we need to consider how a monopolist sets its prices and output levels. Unlike in a competitive market, a monopolist is the sole seller of a good or service without close substitutes, giving them market power to influence the price of their product.

The monopolist's demand curve is the market demand curve, which is downward sloping. This means that if the monopolist wants to sell more units, it must lower the price. This leads to a marginal revenue (MR) curve that lies below the demand curve because each additional unit sold increases total revenue by less than the price at which the unit is sold, due to the price effect of having to lower the price on all units to sell one more.

Profit maximization occurs where marginal revenue equals marginal cost ($MR = MC$). The monopolist will produce up to the point where the cost of producing one more unit (MC) is exactly equal to the revenue generated from selling that unit (MR). This determines the profit-maximizing output level.

Graphically, this can be illustrated as follows:

- The downward-sloping market demand curve (D) is also the average revenue (AR) curve for the monopolist.
- The MR curve lies below the AR curve, starting at the same point on the price axis but with twice the slope.
- The upward-sloping MC curve intersects the MR curve at the profit-maximizing level of output.
- The ATC curve, typically U-shaped, shows the cost of each unit produced.
- The monopolist will set a price (P) on the demand curve directly above the intersection point of the MR and MC curves.
- The shaded area between the price (P) and the ATC curve up to the profit-maximizing output level represents the monopolist's profit.

In conclusion, the monopolist's profit-maximizing quantity and price are determined by where the MR curve intersects the MC curve. The price is then found on the demand curve above this quantity, and the profit is the area between this price and the ATC at the quantity produced.
