Introduction

Performance reviews can be nerve-racking—especially when it comes to self-evaluation. Am I being too critical? What if I seem arrogant?

It's often difficult to know what to write or how well it will be received. In this article, you'll discover why your self-evaluation is important, learn how to get started writing yours, and find 50 performance phrases you can use on your self-evaluation.

When you write your self-evaluation, there are three main areas you want to focus on:

What to keep doing – What have you done that has contributed to your accomplishments? What has helped you develop strong working relationships?

What to stop doing – What are you doing that negatively affects how your peers or supervisor perceives your performance?

What to start doing – What are you not doing now that you should be doing?

Once you can answer these questions, you'll be ready to write your self-evaluation.
