

Worms

Most common types of worm

Though there are thousands of kinds of worms, only one worm survives that affects the garden is known as the night crawler. They have the name because they are nocturnal, which means they are active at night. People who enjoy taking often use worms as bait to target fish. The most popular worm for this is the earthworm. The kind of worm is only one found after heavy storms and floods. The nematode is found when the soil is wet and that it has a hole in the ground surrounded with water.

Why worms are common

Worms do not have a gender. They are able to reproduce on their own.

If a worm is injured, it is able to heal itself and can even regenerate if it has its tail cut off.

Because worms don't have lungs like humans and other animals, they have evolved to breathe through their skin.

Worms

Worms are often overlooked by people for being useless or ugly, but they are vital for our planet. They have existed for about 600 million years. There are more than 34,000 different types of worm. Many are so minute that you couldn't see them with the naked eye. You would need special equipment like a magnifying glass or even a microscope.

Did you know?

The longest earthworm ever found was in South Africa and it measured approximately 7 metres long!

Worms burrow through the soft layers of soil, leaving behind spaces, which allow water and air to reach the lower layers. Every gardener knows that a healthy garden needs plenty of worms.

To help them slide through the ground, worms secrete a slimy substance called mucus on their skin. This slime also has another use. It is rich in nutrients that help plants to grow well.
