Introduction

In this laboratory, you will discover that the same principles of genetics apply to humans as they do to plants and fruit flies. A gene has two alternate forms, called alleles, for any trait, such as hairline, finger length, and so on. One possible allele, designated by a capital letter, is dominant over the recessive allele, designated by a lowercase letter. An individual can be homozygous dominant (two dominant alleles, EE), homozygous recessive (two recessive alleles, ee), or heterozygous (one dominant and one recessive allele, Ee). Genotype refers to an individual's alleles, and phenotype refers to an individual's appearance (Fig. 11.1). Homozygous dominant and also heterozygous individuals show the dominant phenotype; homozygous recessive individuals show the recessive phenotype.

Unattached earlobes (E) are dominant over attached earlobes (e). a. Homozygous dominant individuals have unattached earlobes. b. Homozygous recessive individuals have attached earlobes. c. Heterozygous individuals have unattached earlobes.

11.1 Determining the Genotype

Humans inherit 46 chromosomes that occur in 23 pairs. Twenty-two of these pairs are called autosomes and one pair is the sex chromosomes. Autosomal traits are determined by alleles on the autosomal chromosomes.
