

PRIMER TO THE NERVOUS SYSTEM

Adapted from S.S. Mader & M. Windelspecht (2016) Human Biology, 14th ed. McGraw-Hill, New York.

1. Structure and function of the nervous system

The nervous system is responsible for the reception and processing of sensory information from both the external and internal environments. The nervous system has two major divisions. The central nervous system (CNS) consists of the brain and spinal cord. The brain is completely surrounded and protected by the skull. It connects directly to the spinal cord, similarly protected by the vertebral column. The peripheral nervous system (PNS) consists of nerves. Nerves lie outside the CNS. The division between the CNS and the PNS is arbitrary. The two systems work together and are connected to each other.

Figure 1

The two divisions of the nervous system. a. The central nervous system (CNS) consists of the brain and spinal cord. The peripheral nervous system (PNS) consists of the nerves, which lie outside the CNS. b. The red arrows are the pathway by which the CNS receives sensory information. The black arrows are the pathway by which the CNS communicates with the somatic nervous system and the autonomic nervous system, two divisions of the PNS.

The nervous system has three specific functions:

1. The nervous system receives sensory input. Sensory receptors in skin and other organs respond to external and internal stimuli by generating nerve signals that travel by way of the PNS to the CNS. For example, if you smell baking cookies, olfactory (smell) receptors in the nose use the PNS to transmit that information to the CNS.
2. The CNS performs information processing and integration, summing up the input it receives from all over the body. The CNS reviews the information, stores the information as memories, and creates the appropriate motor responses. The smell of those baking cookies evokes memories of their taste.
3. The CNS generates motor output. Nerve signals from the CNS go by way of the PNS to the muscles, glands, and organs, all in response to the cookies. Signals to the salivary glands make you salivate. Your stomach generates the acid and enzymes needed to digest the cookies
