

Experimenting with Differentiation

As a teacher, you will have to experiment with differentiating your lessons to meet the needs of your learners.

1. Experiment with questions in lessons	2. Explore what this does to learners	3. Experiment with new ideas
• Ask questions that challenge your learners to think deeply about the topic. • Ask questions that require your learners to explain their thinking. • Ask questions that require your learners to justify their answers.	• Observe how your learners respond to the questions. • Note the quality of their responses. • Note the time it takes them to respond.	• Try different ways of asking questions. • Try different ways of responding to questions. • Try different ways of justifying answers.

As you experiment, you will need to keep a record of your findings.

1. What questions did you ask? (Record the questions you asked and the responses you received.)
2. How did your learners respond to the questions? (Record the quality of their responses and the time it took them to respond.)
3. What did you learn from the experiment? (Record your findings and the questions you asked.)
4. How did you respond to the questions? (Record the quality of your responses and the time it took you to respond.)

As you experiment, you will need to keep a record of your findings. This can be done by using the following:

1. A record of the questions you asked.
2. A record of the responses you received.
