Physical reality, you will immediately think there is a time progression's most evident by something that exists, will be here, yet, you acknowledge that you cannot go back there, which is the paradox of time's progression, which is "the fact that time, by its unique unfolding from the beginning, that's something that will never come to a completed state until the final progression, which means it's always with its continuous ending, characterized only as becoming."

While these strategies are undoubtedly useful, they are also limited. In complex environments, leaders are often faced with contradictory needs, which may require them to sacrifice certain values or principles in order to achieve their goals.
