From studies, numerous theories have been proposed to explain the strongest emotional bond of adopted frequency response rate modulation and wide dynamic range that are observed for the use in recording and processing of acoustic signals. The most recent hypothesis is that the auditory system of mammals is particularly well adapted (compared to nonmammals) for processing signals with a wide dynamic range. Thus, the auditory system of mammals is able to process signals with a wide dynamic range. This is achieved by the use of a wide range of frequencies and amplitudes.
