

Architectural paint research: an important tool for understanding historic buildings and their interiors

Eloy F. Koldeweij

Abstract Building historians in the Netherlands are beginning to use architectural paint research as a tool for gaining a better understanding of historic buildings and their interiors. Their positive collaboration with architectural paint researchers has produced new and surprising insights into historic buildings. It is evident that to acquire a full understanding of an historic building and its evolution, these two disciplines need each other and such joint ventures are now becoming common in Dutch building conservation. Although many conservation professionals, at both provincial and national level, now appreciate the benefits of this new research methodology, there are still those who remain to be convinced of the added value of architectural paint research, considering it just a waste of time and money.

Keywords: building historians, architectural paint research, interior, building conservation, 17th century, the Netherlands

Introduction

Historic buildings are curious objects. In most cases, their history is something of a mystery, their previous use(s) only partially understood and their former occupants unknown or shadowy figures. No single building interior has escaped alteration, whether due to changes in fashion, structural alteration or damage. Such human interventions involved a variety of professionals such as upholsterers, painters, paper-hangers, electricians, plumbers and even engineers who normally worked under the supervision of an architect, interior decorator or the owner of the building.

When an historic interior comes under the close scrutiny of the conservator, the real challenge is to identify, interpret and assess its specific values. The average historic building contains various interior elements that have, to a greater or lesser degree, been extended, modernised or even totally mutilated. Lowered ceilings, double walls, additional floors, several layers of paint or wall hangings may be covering earlier decorations, elements and features which are of great significance. Building historians and architectural paint researchers need to be patient and wait until major conservation or restoration works are planned. During the preparatory phase and while the actual building activities are being carried out, it is possible in most cases to make a detailed analysis of all the existing elements. Such an investigation is an absolute necessity in the unravelling of the history and the changing appearances of an historic interior through the course of time. Only after such an investigation will it become clear which are the important features and characteristics of that specific house, its original appearance and how it was altered during the use by successive generations. Such information is vital to prevent the loss of important historical values and to make the proper decisions about the actual conservation or restoration works.

It has been proved time and time again that such research is highly complex, even though the final conclusions may offer a deceptively straightforward and logical explanation. It is only by collaboration between various specialists, however, that the meaning and significance of individual building elements and the historic layers may reveal their identity and their relationship to each other.¹ The building historian and interior historian are as necessary in this process as the architectural paint researcher. This multidisciplinary approach goes even further: the modern building historian cannot do without the help of an architectural draughtsman and a dendro-chronologist; the paint researcher requires the assistance of the laboratory analyst; and both need the input of an interior historian. The modern, well-trained, paint researcher will employ various technical research methods including scanning electron microscopy (SEM), Fourier transform infrared spectroscopy (FTIR), gas chromatography-mass spectrometry (GC-MS) and high performance liquid chromatography (HPLC). These highly specialised analytical processes are in fact as necessary as the trusty scalpel and the stereomicroscope.

Depending on the features discovered in a specific interior, the input of other specialists is often required, e.g. art historians or conservators specialised in the fields of paintings, sculptures, textiles, wallpapers, furniture, stained glass, natural stone and technical installations, or even genealogists and experts in heraldry. In complex projects, a huge diversity of disciplines may be required. In all cases where more than one person is involved, consultation and discussion between these specialists is essential. Without this there is a serious risk that the individual inputs will lead to conflicting
