

Yale Art and Architecture Building | New Haven, Connecticut, USA

Paul Rudolph | 1963

Designed and constructed during Paul Rudolph's tenure as chief of the architecture department, the iconic Art and Architecture Building (AAB) unites three levels around a central core of open, collective spaces, enclosed by a series of double-curtain walls. The exterior, which combines classical elements, and varied forms, particularly heavy, produces a variety of mixed and spatial meanings and relationships, most notably among the separate central atrium spaces and galleries, and the more peripheral and compressed studios and offices. Fragmented walls, bridges, and offset walkways for circulation among adjacent spaces while allowing for complex views through large, steel-framed glass windows from deep within the exterior. Blurred lines of heavily textured, steel-framed concrete provide structural support for horizontal platforms, heavy mechanical services, and complex circulation. All the open work, the play of horizontal planes goes up to enclosed habitable forms that bridge the vertical masses to enrich the space below. Between these volumes is a collection of skylights and overhangs that bridge, extending the shared space of this complex combination of architectural types.
