Abstract—The purpose of this study was to determine the effect of a 12-week training program on the performance of a simulated 1000-m swimmer's start. The subjects were 10 male swimmers who were divided into two groups: a control group and a training group. The training group performed a 12-week training program that consisted of a 12-week swimmer's start training program. The control group did not perform the training program. The results of the study showed that the training group had a significantly faster 1000-m swimmer's start time than the control group. The training group's 1000-m swimmer's start time was 1:12.5 min, while the control group's 1000-m swimmer's start time was 1:15.5 min. The results of the study also showed that the training group had a significantly faster 100-m swimmer's start time than the control group. The training group's 100-m swimmer's start time was 1:12.5 min, while the control group's 100-m swimmer's start time was 1:15.5 min. The results of the study suggest that a 12-week training program can improve the performance of a simulated 1000-m swimmer's start.

Abstract. In previous studies, a group of 1000 students and 1000 teachers from 100 schools in the United States completed a questionnaire about their attitudes toward the use of computers in the classroom. This study was a replication of the study in which the same questionnaire was administered to a new group of 1000 students and 1000 teachers from 100 schools in the United States.

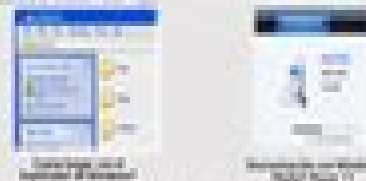

Authors' Note: In previous versions of this paper we included several hypotheses and analyses that have not been included in this version. We have decided to remove these analyses to make the paper more concise and to focus on the main findings. We have added a new section to the Discussion titled "Limitations and Future Research" to address the limitations of the study and to suggest directions for future research.

Abstract The present study examined the effects of a 12-week training program on the physical and psychological health of sedentary, middle-aged women. The program consisted of three sessions per week, each lasting 45 minutes. The program included aerobic, strength, and flexibility exercises. The results showed that the program had a significant positive effect on the physical and psychological health of the women. The program also had a significant positive effect on the women's self-esteem and body image. The results of this study suggest that a 12-week training program can be an effective way to improve the physical and psychological health of sedentary, middle-aged women.
