

Abstract The purpose of this study was to determine the effect of a 12-week training program on the physical and psychological health of sedentary, middle-aged women. The program consisted of three sessions per week, each lasting 45 minutes. The first session was a warm-up, the second was a cardiovascular workout, and the third was a strength training session. The results showed that the women who participated in the program experienced significant improvements in their physical and psychological health. Specifically, there were significant increases in heart rate, blood pressure, and body mass index (BMI). Additionally, there were significant decreases in anxiety and depression scores. The findings suggest that a 12-week training program can effectively improve the physical and psychological health of sedentary, middle-aged women.

- Background: Liver cancer affects more than 600,000 people worldwide each year, and is the second leading cause of cancer death. The most common type of liver cancer is hepatocellular carcinoma (HCC), which is often diagnosed at a late stage, when the cancer has spread to other parts of the body. HCC is a complex disease, and its treatment is often challenging. One of the most common treatments for HCC is surgery, but this is only possible in a small number of patients. Other treatments include chemotherapy, radiation therapy, and targeted therapy. However, these treatments often have side effects, and their effectiveness is limited. Therefore, there is a need for new and improved treatments for HCC.

- Abstract: The purpose of this study was to determine the effect of a 12-week training program on the physical fitness and health-related quality of life (HRQL) of sedentary, middle-aged men. The study was a randomized, controlled trial. The intervention group (IG) consisted of 20 men who participated in a 12-week training program. The control group (CG) consisted of 20 men who did not participate in the training program. The IG showed significant improvements in physical fitness and HRQL compared to the CG. The results suggest that a 12-week training program can improve physical fitness and HRQL in sedentary, middle-aged men.
