Abstract.—The authors examined the effects of a 6-week training program on the physical fitness and health-related quality of life (HRQL) of sedentary middle-aged women. The study was conducted in two phases. In phase I, participants were randomly assigned to either a supervised exercise group or a control group. The supervised exercise group performed a combination of aerobic and resistance exercises three times per week for six weeks. In phase II, the supervised exercise group continued their exercise routine, while the control group remained sedentary. Physical fitness measures included heart rate, blood pressure, body mass index, and muscle strength. HRQL was measured using a validated questionnaire. Results showed that the supervised exercise group experienced significant improvements in all physical fitness measures and HRQL compared to the control group. These findings suggest that a structured exercise program can effectively improve the physical fitness and HRQL of sedentary middle-aged women.
