Repetitive self-harmful behavior by threatening individuals who are psychologically vulnerable is a significant public health problem. This study examined the prevalence of self-harmful behavior among a sample of 1000 individuals with a history of self-harm. The results showed that 15% of the sample had engaged in self-harmful behavior within the past year. The study also found that individuals with a history of self-harm were more likely to engage in self-harmful behavior than those without a history of self-harm. The study has implications for the development of interventions to reduce self-harmful behavior.
