Shore

After Santiago arrives at Tangier in The Alchemist, he visits a bar. What omens appear to him there? Why might he have made good use of Urim and Thummim there?

Both the Spanish-speaking young man and the angry bar owner are omens. Santiago recognizes the young man to be an omen, but he does not realize the bar owner is one also. Santiago operates out of anxiety and fear largely because he does not speak Arabic, thus mistaking the meaning of both these omens. If he had used Urim and Thummim, he would have learned that the Spanish-speaking man was not an ally but a thief. In retrospect, Santiago realizes that the bar owner was, in fact, an omen—one who “was trying to tell him not to trust that man.” He vows to watch more closely for signs and omens as he continues his journey.

Santiago

After the Spanish-speaking man steals Santiago's money in The Alchemist, the shepherd reflects on his situation. What advice does Santiago come up with that helps him continue his journey?

As Santiago thinks about his situation—alone with no money in a foreign land—he determines that it is up to him to choose his path forward. He must decide to regard himself as either the thief's victim or as “an adventurer, looking for treasure.” With his confidence regained, he goes around the desk and empty marketplace. Although it is still deserted, the place is no longer a strange location—it's simply a new one, and exploring new places is one of his goals. Once again, exercising his free will moves Santiago a step closer to enlightenment.

Santiago Free Will versus Fate

In The Alchemist, why might the author have chosen crystal as the product sold by the merchant?

Crystal is breakable, valuable, beautiful, and clear when it is clean. In these ways, it is like life itself. When Santiago cleans the crystal glasses in the window of the shop, two customers come in and buy the crystal because they can now truly see its beauty. Similarly, people who see life clearly can appreciate its beauty and value. The merchant, who is fearful, doesn't want to build a display case for the crystal—he thinks that “people will pass by and bump into it, and pieces will be broken.” The display case is like his dream of Mecca, which he refuses to realize because then he'll have “no reason to go on living.” He does, however, give Santiago permission to build the display, and the narrator comments, “Not everyone can see his dreams come true in the same way.” In other words, some people, such as Santiago, will advance further than others in pursuit of their Personal Legend.

Santiago Crystal Merchant

How does Santiago change throughout his time working with the crystal merchant in The Alchemist?

After his first month on the job with the crystal merchant, Santiago realizes the work “isn't exactly the kind of job that would make him happy.” The merchant spends his time “telling the boy to be careful with the pieces and not to break anything.” Although unimpressed by the job, Santiago decides to stay until he can save enough money to buy sheep and return to his life as a shepherd. If he cannot journey on to Egypt and the quest for his Personal Legend, at least he can still travel around Andalusia. Over time, however, Santiago grows enthusiastic and invested in the job. He realizes his work leads to increased business, and he comes up with innovative ways to increase sales even more, such as selling tea to thirsty customers who climb the hill. His ability to succeed at business in a foreign country boosts his confidence, and although he
