Akzidenz (sic) Grotesk was released by Berthold in Berlin in 1898, according to their own literature. It was obviously based on faces already offered by other foundries, some of which were later taken over by Berthold. One of the contemporaries of AG was Royal Grotesk from Theinhardt. In Berthold's specimen booklet no. 429, which was most likely released in 1954, Akzidenz Grotesk Mager (light) was still referred to as Royal Grotesk, in brackets. Berthold acquired a typeface in 1908, (when they bought Herdt/Theinhardt) which they released as Akzidenz Grotesk Halbfett (medium). They kept adding weights, some of them from other faces, acquired from other foundries. Every foundry had a version of that type of face, more often than not available in a few sizes only. The original series remained quite diverse, individual weights showing not much resemblance but in name. It was mainly a marketing and naming success. That only changed when they cut Series 57, and then Series 58, named for the years of release. These had some sizes (but not all) recut under the direction of Günter Gerhard Lange, who was their (freelance) artistic director at the time.

1900 SANS SERIF

The first of the sans serif typefaces were considered awkward and unappealing since they lacked the traditional spirit. There are three kinds of sans serif: Grotesque are earlier Grotesques and more elegant Neo-Grotesques. Geometric are influenced by Bauhaus designs. Humanist sans-serifs contains some features of serif typefaces. In general, sans serif typefaces have little or no variation between thick and thin strokes, lack serifs, have larger x-heights and no stress in rounded strokes.

1825 SLAB SERIF

Slab serifs originally originated as early as the Industrial Revolution of the 18th century. Slab serif fonts were bold and easy to read making them ideal for advertising posters which began to appear due to wider availability of printing technology. Characteristics for Slab serifs typefaces include minimal variation of thick and thin strokes, heavy serifs with squared-off ends, large x-heights, vertical stress in rounded strokes.

1775 MODERN

Modern typefaces arise with the distribution of the copper and steel engraving in the 17th and 18th century. The appearance is technically exact. Characteristics for Modern typefaces include extreme contrast between thick and thin strokes, heavy serifs with real beveling, small x-height, and vertical stress in rounded strokes.

1750 TRANSITIONAL

These typefaces form the transition of Renaissance Old Style to Modern typefaces. With the introduction of the printing press, the design of the letter became more formal. Characteristics for Transitional typefaces show greater contrast between thick and thin strokes, wider gracefully bracketed serifs with flat tops, larger x-height, vertical stress in rounded strokes and the height of capitals matches that of ascenders. Minimals are cap height and consistent in size.

1475 OLD

Old style typefaces are like modern typefaces regarding their origin. A refinement of letter forms is to be recognized during the further development of the letterform. Characteristics for Old Style typefaces are minimal variation of thick and thin strokes, small, curved serifs, often with slightly concave bases, small x-heights, in the round strokes the stress is diagonal, or oblique as their designs mimic the hand-held angle of the pen nibs of the scribes. The tops of lowercase ascenders often exceed the height of the capital characters.
