14.1 INTRODUCTION

In this unit we see some immediate applications of the concepts which we have studied in Blocks 1 and 2.

Differential Calculus has varied applications. You have already seen some applications to geometrical, physical and practical problems in Units 8 and 9. In this unit, we shall study some applications to the theory of real functions.

There are some questions in mathematics, that can be asked even before knowing differentiation, but can be solved with ease by using the theorems on differentiation. In other words, differentiation is a useful tool in solving problems that arise independent of this notion, for example, a) Is the function $\sin x + \cos x$ increasing in $[0, \pi/4]$?

b) Do we have the inequality $e^x > 1 + x$ for all x ?

c) What is the limit of $\frac{1 - e^x}{\sin x}$ when x tends to 0?

d) What is the approximate value of $\cos 1^\circ$?

Do you notice that these questions do not involve any concept that you have not studied earlier? You could have asked them earlier. You could have even answered some of them. Here we shall see how the theorems of Unit 7 can be systematically applied to yield solutions to such questions. Keep Block 2 ready with you since you will need to read the relevant portions from the units in that block.

Objectives

After studying this unit you should be able to:

- recognise the equivalence of some properties of functions (like monotonicity and positiveness or negativeness of its derivative),
- prove some inequalities using the mean value theorems,
- apply Taylor's series to obtain approximate values of certain functions at certain points.

14.2 MONOTONIC FUNCTIONS

In this section we employ differentiation to decide whether a given function is monotonic or not.

First we recall some terms from Unit 1. We say that a function from an interval I to $\mathbb{R}$ is monotonic if it is either an increasing function on I or a decreasing function on I .

It is said to be an increasing function on I , if $x \leq y$ implies $f(x) \leq f(y)$. Increasing
