

The main characteristic of separation anxiety is when a child becomes upset when parted from a parent or carer. It is a specific phobia and a type of anxiety. Separation anxiety is considered normal in early childhood and in most cases eases, as the child reaches school age.

If this anxiety is recurrent and causes a lot of distress for the child, it may be possible that the child has separation anxiety disorder.

Separation anxiety disorder may be present when:

- the anxiety is impacting on the child's ability to live their life;
- the anxiety has persisted for more than four weeks;
- the level of anxiety is extremely high and causing the child ongoing distress.

Separation anxiety disorder can also result in a child experiencing a panic attack when separated or are thinking about being separated from a caregiver.

Other signs of social anxiety disorder may be:

- refusing to attend school or other social events when they need to be separated from their parent or carer;
- expressing that they feel sick when they have been separated from their parent or carer;
- worrying that something might happen to their parent or carer when they are not with them.

It is important to involve a professional diagnosis before labelling a child with anxiety related to a specific phobia.

It is important to have clear communication of how the child's presentation is related to their needs, such as a caregiver knowing how off or what support is needed to help the child with their anxiety. The child is displaying symptoms of social anxiety disorder when it is not a temporary response to a specific situation or event, but a persistent pattern of behaviour that causes ongoing distress. There are several indicators that a child has social anxiety disorder. They may avoid social situations, such as school, or have difficulty making friends. They may also avoid social situations, such as school, or have difficulty making friends. They may also avoid social situations, such as school, or have difficulty making friends.
