Abstract
 The purpose of this study was to determine the effect of a 12-week training program on the physical fitness and health of sedentary, middle-aged men. The subjects were 20 men, aged 40-50 years, who were sedentary and had no known cardiovascular disease. They were divided into two groups: a control group and an exercise group. The exercise group performed a 12-week training program consisting of three sessions per week of aerobic and resistance training. The control group did not exercise. Physical fitness was measured at baseline and after 12 weeks using a variety of tests, including a maximal aerobic test, a submaximal aerobic test, and a resistance test. Health was measured using a questionnaire that assessed symptoms of cardiovascular disease, such as chest pain, shortness of breath, and fatigue. The results of the study showed that the exercise group had significantly higher levels of physical fitness and better health than the control group after 12 weeks of training. The exercise group had a higher maximal aerobic capacity, a lower heart rate during submaximal exercise, and a higher resistance than the control group. The exercise group also reported fewer symptoms of cardiovascular disease than the control group. These findings suggest that a 12-week training program can improve physical fitness and health in sedentary, middle-aged men.
