Abstract – Drawing on the concept of the sergeant, a term used in the past to describe a person who is responsible for a group of people, this study explores the role of the sergeant in the workplace. The study is based on a series of interviews with 10 participants who were asked to describe their experience of working as a sergeant. The study found that the sergeant is a person who is responsible for a group of people and who is often the first person to be contacted in an emergency. The study also found that the sergeant is often a person who is very experienced and who has a good knowledge of the workplace. The study concludes that the sergeant is a very important person in the workplace and that their role should be recognized and valued.

Abstract: Learning and teaching for understanding and action requires integration of conceptual knowledge and application of that knowledge.
