The Development and Implementation of Process Piping Inspection Programs

Many industrial accidents have been caused by the failure of process piping. These failures are often related to corrosion and materials degradation. Applicable codes and standards state that:

"It is the owner's responsibility to verify that all required examinations and testing have been completed and to inspect piping to the extent that is necessary to be satisfied that it conforms to all applicable examination requirements of the Code and engineering design."

Refineries and petrochemical plants typically have thousands of miles of process piping. Many of these piping systems are difficult to reach, are often insulated, and are difficult to inspect. Because of this, piping is usually inspected at only a few locations. The process of defining and naming corrosion circuits, identifying thickness monitoring locations (TML), and measuring and analyzing data is crucial in assisting management to making important economic and safety decisions.

However, many process piping inspection programs are poorly designed and badly implemented. Some plants are overwhelmed by too many TMLs and large amounts of data, while others have little or no data. Inspection points should be selected where experience suggests corrosion is likely to cause significant problems. Often this experience is lacking. Data collection and inspections can produce poor information, and the control and tracking of data is poorly organized. Because of this, piping inspection programs are seen as problematic, complex, time consuming, inefficient, and costly.
