The final development that set the stage for the collapse of American prosperity in 1929 was the speculative boom that developed with increasing intensity in the years after 1927. As more investors put their money into securities (stocks) in the hope of making a quick profit on a speculative rise in stocks, the character of the New York Stock Exchange was fundamentally altered. Instead of serving primarily as a device for the accumulation of capital of industrial enterprises, the exchange became a betting ring where people gambled on stocks in much the same fashion that gamblers wagered on roulette or horse races. Security prices were forced up by competitive bidding rather than by any fundamental improvement in American corporate enterprise.
