Additional information on left-turn lanes, including their suggested lengths, can be found in Highway Research Record 214, NCHRP Report Synthesis 225, and NCHRP Report 279, and NCHRP Report 745 (40, 19, 17, 9). In the case of double left-turn lanes, a capacity analysis of the intersection should be performed to determine what traffic controls are needed in order for it to function properly.

Local conditions and the cost of right-of-way often influence the type of intersection selected as well as many of the design details. Limited sight distance, for example, may make it desirable to control traffic by yield signs, stop signs, or traffic signals when the traffic densities are less than those ordinarily considered appropriate for such control. The alignment and grade of the intersecting roads and the angle of intersection may make it advisable to channelize or use auxiliary pavement areas, regardless of the traffic densities. In general, traffic service, highway design designation, physical conditions, and cost of right-of-way are considered jointly in choosing the type of intersection.

For the general benefit of through-traffic movements, the number of crossroads, intersecting roads, or intersecting streets should be minimized. Where intersections are closely spaced on a two-way facility, it is seldom practical to provide signals for completely coordinated traffic movements at reasonable speeds in opposing directions on that facility. At the same time, the resultant road or street patterns should permit travel on roadways other than the predominant highway without too much inconvenience. Traffic analysis is needed to determine whether the road or street pattern, left open across the predominate pre-dominant highway, is adequate to serve normal traffic plus the traffic diverted from any terminated road or street.

Discussion

Much of the subsection on "Guidelines for Design of Left-Turn Lanes" is really more about the installation of left-turn lanes. This subsection could be split into multiple parts, to include discussion of installation, warrants, and general design principles. The existing text in the first two paragraphs is on installation. The suggested revised text can be presented as a subsection on warrants to fill an information need. The remaining text can then be the subsection on "Guidelines for Design of Left-Turn Lanes."

Also, there is a minor typo in the last paragraph that begins on page 9-132.

The revisions add the warrant information developed in NCHRP Project 3-91 (NCHRP Report 745) (9) and correct some typographical errors in the text. The suggested revised text is from Appendix A of NCHRP Report 745, updated to reflect changes between the 2004 Green Book used as the source then and the 2011 edition used now.
