...t to compare how the colonists and British military used geographical features.

Lexington & Concord Battle

During the Revolutionary War, the British fought in battles near the shoreline. This gave them a tactical advantage. However, the British were unfamiliar with the terrain of Lexington and Concord. The British had to move through wooded areas, which slowed them down. The British were also at risk of ambushes and injuries. The British had to fight a difficult battle against the American army.

The Battle of

At the Battle of Saratoga, American troops used the Hudson River to their advantage.

Battle of Yorktown

In the battle of Yorktown, the Americans worked with the French and strategically used Yorktown's geographical advantage. They surrounded the British on three sides. The British were forced to retreat to the high ground to bombard British positions. The French navy blocked the Chesapeake Bay. This stopped the British from receiving support and further isolating the British army.

How did the British navy contribute to their success near the shoreline compared to the other battles?
