Abstract: This study aims to investigate the impact of digital marketing on the sales performance of small and medium-sized enterprises (SMEs) in the retail sector. The research focuses on the adoption and usage of digital marketing strategies, such as social media, email marketing, and search engine optimization (SEO), and their relationship to sales growth and customer engagement. The study uses a quantitative approach, collecting data from a sample of 100 SMEs through a survey. The results show that digital marketing adoption is positively correlated with sales performance, with social media and email marketing showing the strongest impact. The study also identifies factors influencing the adoption of digital marketing, such as business size, owner's digital literacy, and access to resources. The findings suggest that digital marketing is a valuable tool for SMEs to enhance their sales and reach a wider audience. The study contributes to the understanding of digital marketing's role in SME growth and provides practical implications for SME owners and managers.

There are also relatively unexplored problems in the management of the environment, such as a growing awareness that natural forests are being lost and that the resulting degradation might have more than local effects (e.g., increased erosion).
