Pharmaceutical Research and Development (R&D) is the process of developing new drugs and medical devices. It is a highly complex and costly process that involves many steps, from target identification to clinical trials. The R&D process is often divided into three main phases: target identification, target validation, and drug development. Target identification involves identifying a specific target (e.g., a protein or gene) that is involved in a disease. Target validation involves confirming that the target is a good target for drug development. Drug development involves designing and synthesizing a drug molecule, testing it in preclinical studies, and then testing it in clinical trials. The R&D process is a long and expensive process, and it is often the case that many drugs that are developed in the early stages of the process are eventually abandoned. However, the R&D process is essential for the development of new drugs and medical devices that can improve the health of patients.
