Abstract: This paper presents the results of a study on the effects of a 12-week intervention program on the self-efficacy of young adults with a history of substance use. The program was designed to enhance self-efficacy through a combination of cognitive-behavioral and experiential techniques. The study found that participants showed significant improvements in self-efficacy scores across various domains, including personal, social, and academic self-efficacy. These findings suggest that the intervention program is effective in building self-efficacy, which is a key factor in promoting positive behavior change and recovery.

Abstract: An online firm designed, evaluated, and implemented a customer-centric business-to-business (B2B) website. The website was designed to meet the needs of its customers, and the results of the evaluation and implementation were compared to the results of a traditional B2B website. The results showed that the online firm's website was more effective than the traditional B2B website in terms of customer satisfaction, website usage, and sales.
