

of what Fogarty (2002) refers to as “civilian” rule, the rule of outsiders that know little or nothing about the accounting profession.

A public accountant is one of the practitioners in the profession of accounting that should maintain high levels of professionalism. This is given the fact that this branch of accounting plays a significant role in safeguarding the public interest as far as public finance is concerned (Fogarty 2002). This view by Fogarty is supported by Goldman (2010) as will be reviewed later in this paper.

This role of the public accountant is affected by the corporate employment trend that is discernible in the current corporate consolidation of accounting firms. This has detrimental effects to the clients, the public. This is given the fact that the public accountants will lack in professionalism, and will not be able to discharge these duties effectively. The independence of the public accountant, who can be viewed as a public auditor, will be greatly impaired.

Given the fact that the firms that have acquired the accounting firms need to make profits, they may resort into offering other services to the clients, such as financial advisory (Fogarty 2002). This lowers the quality of the accounting services rendered to the clients, the public, given that the public accountant is forced to focus their attention to other activities that generate more revenue to the corporation, ignoring the accounting role.

Fogarty (2002) concludes by restating that commercialization of the accounting profession leads to lack of professionalism. The author is of the view that if this trend continues, the future of the accounting profession, and the hopes that the clients have over the same, will be greatly dented.
